

HIDDEN TREASURE

This stylish, cosy kitchen-living space is a far cry from the dark, dreary basement it once was

“Stylish pieces in natural, chalky hues recur throughout for a cohesive look that complements the kitchen finishes and infuses the space with a sense of calm.”

Robert and Deborah Lawrence's Victorian home boasts a fabulous, central location and ample space, but when they moved in the interior was tired and lacklustre. Thus, they decided to strip it all back to the original brickwork and make it more exciting, at the same time installing a new staircase, electrics and lighting. Overhauling the dark, dingy basement was particularly important, as this is where the family tended to gravitate.

“The Lawrences’ brief for the lower ground floor was basically to create a fun, open-plan kitchen-cum-family area where they could all comfortably spend time together,” recalls Mark Howorth of design practice Callender Howorth, who masterminded the refurbishment. He created a modern, elegant kitchen towards the front of the room, which flows seamlessly into a dining and living area, then, at the rear, placed a built-in day bed on one side and a desk area on the other – both of which overlook the garden thanks to full-height glass doors. This way, the family can be using the computer, watching TV, lounging on the day bed or cooking whilst all still being together.

Being such an open-plan space, it was important that the kitchen was stylish but unobtrusive, which was achieved by using timeless, neutral finishes. The tall housing on the opposite wall, meanwhile, is sprayed in a metallic lacquer to tie in with the large stainless-steel fridge-freezer, which works beautifully with the white composite worktops ▶

Above right: “The veneer that we used on the base units is called Alpi Acero Friser 59. It’s a very mellow, modern matt lacquer that brings interest to the design, because sometimes minimalist white joinery can look a bit bland,” says Giorgia Vainutyte of Holloways of Ludlow.

Right: Mark suggested running a low stone shelf beneath the fireplace, adding visual impact to the room and signalling the transition from dining to living.

Below left: The base of the island features a set of dishwasher drawers and double sink cabinet. Grooves have been skilfully carved into the cupboard doors to make them appear like drawers, creating a clean, symmetrical look.

to establish how they live and cook in the space," Giorgia elaborates. "So my job is to find the best layout for the joinery and what goes within it – for example where the dishwasher and warming drawer are placed for easier access, where the microwave hides, where the cereal is stored and breakfast plates gathered and so on."

As the Lawrence home illustrates, this is a very successful collaboration. There's a plethora of storage with units extending the entire length of one wall as well as around the island and across another bank of tall housing. Even the space beneath the staircase is fitted out with cabinetry, ensuring every spare inch is effectively utilised. "The smallest compartment, at the foot of the stairs, is used for storing dog food, while the next cupboard houses the children's toys, followed by a double cabinet concealing extensive racking for wine," explains Giorgia. "So there is a lot going on down here, but it's all very cleverly hidden away."

The same concept extends to the kitchen where a cupboard door next to the fridge slides back into a pocket, completely disappearing so that all breakfast items are on display and easily accessible throughout the morning. Similarly, sliding cabinetry behind the hob conceals much and dark slate flooring. Once Mark had the basic concept and colour scheme planned out, he took his plans to Giorgia Vainutyte of Holloways of Ludlow to fine-tune the design and source a range of material samples.

"We have worked with Callender Howorth for a long time – it comes to us with a concept for the space and then we take it from there, working with the client directly of the worktop along the wall, meaning that cooking oils, bottles and the microwave are hidden away but always close to hand and ready to use. Indeed, the entire room is meticulously designed in this way, providing myriad functions and storage solutions whilst appearing deceptively simple.

“The biggest challenge with this project was that Callender Howorth suggested having an entire wall of joinery, which looks very modern and minimalist, but there were two chimney breasts to work around; one where the hob is and the other where the fireplace is,” explains Giorgia. “They also wanted a low stone shelf protruding from this wall to add visual impact and highlight the linear design, which was quite tricky to get in between the joinery.”

She has, however, executed this all beautifully. The joins in the shelf (which were necessary being such a long piece) match up perfectly with the door lines for a clean, symmetrical look, while the chimney breast challenge was overcome by creating a mix of shallow and deep units behind the uniform wall, along with some panelling behind the TV. There are also dedicated shelves for DVDs and books in addition to a flap panel to hide the AV equipment below the TV. As Giorgia remarks, “There is a place for absolutely everything.”

Despite the multiple zones – cooking, dining, relaxing and working – the entire space pulls together effortlessly thanks to Mark’s selection of furniture and furnishings. Stylish pieces in natural, chalky hues recur throughout for a cohesive look that complements the kitchen finishes and infuses the space with a sense of calm. The overall look is elegant yet relaxed and one that is unlikely to date. “Our aim was not to do anything too faddish,” confirms Mark. “It’s much better to think carefully about materials and what will stand the test of time – especially with kitchens.” [KBB]

Mark’s brief was to transform a dark, depressing basement into a comfortable and beautiful family space. He achieved this with stylish furniture, relaxing colours and sumptuous fabrics.
